Joachim Burmeister's systematic exposition of the musical-rhetorical style, culminating in his Musica poetica (1606), established the first vocabulary of musical figures, parallels of their rhetorical counterparts, and essential building-blocks of the practice of musica poetica for the succeeding two centuries.

Musica Poetica

A knowledge of both Classical rhetoric and musica poetica can greatly enhance the listener's understanding and appreciation of works composed in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, especially by such figures as Heinrich Schütz and Giacomo Carissimi. However, it is also important not to seek examples of musical figures on every page; while rhetoric and musical theory were strongly associated, the nature of this association was complex and variable.
